

Vice president refuses...

Last year's ASUN president, Rick Mockler was the last ASUN president to receive a salary. The new salary policy went into effect when Wedekind took office in March.

Mockler, said the official reason that the regents gave was not the real one. ASUN presidents have been paid for about 10 years, and there was no raise in salary when the student regent position was created by constitutional amendment in 1974.

The original situation continued until ASUN president Renee Wessels' term in spring 1980, Mockler said, when the regents criticized the student fee policy that provided funds to ASUN, the Daily Nebraskan and political speakers. The regents required a vote on whether the funds should continue, and instituted a refund system for those persons who did not want to pay for the services.

"Frankly, I think their assumption was that students wouldn't approve these items in a vote," Mockler said.

However, students did, and only 0.5 percent of students had their fee money refunded, he said.

The situation escalated when Wessels turned out to be an outspoken student regent, especially on the affirmative action issue, he said.

"Several regents decided to eliminate the student president's salary in reaction to Renee's year," he said. "It was a vindictive move on the part of several regents. There's no question about that."

Mockler was told by one regent that if there was an uncritical student regent, the board would be willing to reinstate the salary, he said.

"The regents rationalized their action on the grounds that the two positions (student regent and president) were the same. I haven't talked to any legal experts who support that," he said.

Moylan denied Mockler's comment. "That's a statement of somebody's imagination," Moylan said.

Mockler said "It was a petulant response to an outspoken student voice. In a university, democratic environment, outspokenness is a good quality. Unfortunately, we had several regents who disagreed with that."

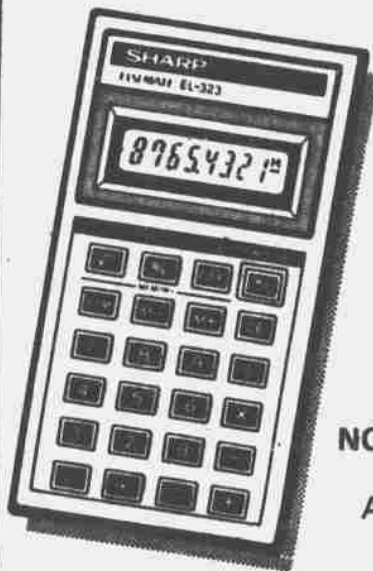

Mockler and UNO student regent Florene Langford tried in May 1981 to reinstate the salary, using several new legal opinions. The motion failed 6-2.

Mockler doesn't think the situation will change until there are some different regents, he said. "I don't think the board is open-minded enough to reconsider their action or even listen to a student voice."
