The Encounter Center services give a new meaning to old bones

The Encounter Center in Morrill Hall will be adding new displays and services for children and teachers, Center Coordinator Kay Young said.

The center is a place where children can come and explore on their own. It was established around 1980 to "enable kids to learn more about their environment and the world in which they live," she said. Last year, more than 47,000 people toured the center, with more than 400 school groups participating.

The center's current displays consist of old bones and fossils that children may pick up and hold, insects, plants and diagrams explaining various life processes.

New services will allow teachers to check out supply boxes dealing with current classroom subjects including food chains, animal tracks and traces of past life and life cycles, Young said.

Visitors to the center also can bring in objects like old rocks or bones and have them "professionally identified," she said.

The aim of program additions is to improve the usefulness of the center and allow for a greater variety of displays and subjects that will be available for children to learn from.

Funding for the center comes from the Junior League of Lincoln, Young said.
