Bats winging around Capitol

It's common knowledge that the state Capitol is the home of the various state government offices. However, a few nocturnal mammals also have been calling the building home.

Ken Fougteron, director of buildings for the state, said a number of bats have made their homes in the upper eshelons of the building. "They like to build their nests in some of the nooks and crannies up there."

Fougteron said the bats have been in the building for quite some time, but he was not aware of any complaints about them.

"People get a little worried when they hear about them, but basically they haven't been a problem," he said. "The only problem I can remember with them is when we were building some air vents for air conditioners up there. Some of them were building nest in them, so we put screens up to keep them out."

The bats can be seen easiest when the floodlights around the Capitol grounds are on. Fougteron said he was not aware that the bats were flapping around the sower figure as some passers-by have reported.

"I didn't know that, but it's entirely likely," Fougteron said.

Cherie Stasenka, a dispatcher in the animal division of the Lincoln Health Department said 10 complaints were made to the department about bats — which often are infected with rabies — in the last two weeks.

"We did have a bat get in a fight with a cat recently," Stasenka said, "and that's the most severe problem we've had involving a bat this year."

Fougteron said the bats nesting in the Capitol will most likely be left alone.

"There's really no reason to go up there after them," Fougteron said. "They haven't caused us any problems."

4-H displays at Fair

The 1982 Nebraska State Fair is displaying 4-H exhibits featuring animal health and safety ideas.

The purpose of these new veterinary science projects, according to Duane Rice, UNL extension veterinarian and exhibit superintendent, is to inform the public of common animal health decisions, as well as to assist them in communication with a veterinarian regarding livestock or pets.

Exhibits are designed to stress "the importance of consulting a professional before taking any action on treatment of pets and domestic livestock," Rice said.

Although the type of exhibits created by the youths vary, most of the displays are photographs and posters.

The 1982 Fair is the first time Nebraska 4-H youths have exhibited the results of their veterinary science learning experiences at the state level. The displays are located in the 4-H exhibit hall.
