

Army Reserve waives enlistee loans

In addition to its other educational benefits, the U.S. Army Reserve will begin "forgiving" a part of the student loans of eligible enlistees starting Oct. 1.

Sgt. Jim Vanderslice, commander of Lincoln's army recruiting station, said the reserve will waive 15 percent or $500, whichever is greater, of all eligible enlistees' student loans granted up to or since their enlistment dates.

To be eligible for this loan forgiveness program, persons must score in the 50th percentile on a test given by the Army, must be enlisted in what the reserve considers one of its "bonus units" and must have had no prior military service.

The reserve already pays 100 percent tuition for eligible college students.

Vanderslice said that about 50 percent of those who join the Army Reserve do so with the intention of going on to some kind of post-secondary school. He said that in the Lincoln area, students who enlist see the reserve's benefits as a secure way of getting through college. Other forms of aid, he said, are inconsistently available.

Enlistment in the Army Reserve is six years and obliges a person to spend up to two months during a summer in basic training, special training in a skill, one weekend per month on active duty using that skill and two weeks a year at a reserve summer camp.

Vanderslice said he encourages all those interested in joining the reserve to contact his form further information. He said there are finer points that need to be discussed before a final decision is made.
