U.S. involvement condemned at rally

By Eric Peterson

Words from a song by folksinger Holly Near set the tone for an El Salvador protest rally on the north steps of the state Capitol Saturday morning:

"Got to find a way to keep the U.S.A. out of places where it doesn't belong. . ."

Rally speakers emphasized their belief that U.S. corporate interests are the only reason the United States aids El Salvador.

"This assault is aimed at maintaining our (the United States) iron grip on the region," said Theresa Holder of the U.S. out of El Salvador Committee, noting that United Brands, Chase Manhattan Bank, and other large U.S. corporations have interests in Central America that would be threatened by a change of government in El Salvador. "These companies are able to reap incredible profits by super-exploitation of the people and resources," she said. "We will be asked to give more and more blood for the wealthy few in this country."

Holder pointed out that rebels are on the offensive in El Salvador despite the more than $80 million the United States has given the country's government in the last year.

News documentation of U.S. advisers participating in combat missions against Salvadoran guerrillas exists, she said. "The parallels with VietNam are frightening."

However, the Salvadoran government's alleged systematic slaughter - "murders and disappearances are on the increase" - has not succeeded in quelling the guerrilla movement, she said. "The guerrilla success would not have been possible without the people's support (in food and other forms)," she said.

The economic situation in El Salvador is desperate. Seventy-five percent of Salvadoran children under 5 are malnourished, and the country has a 50 percent infant mortality rate, Holder said. Also, the land reform program has been thwarted and the number of landless peasants increases daily.

The United States government continued its opposition to the Sandinista government in Nicaragua, which overthrew dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979. Holder said the United States has spent $19 million for covert actions against the Sandinistas.

"Aid was cut off to the Sandinista government while money was sent to reactionary business groups and AFL-CIO affiliated trade unions," she said.
