

Making waves . . .

Spinning in response to a pinch, she learned McArony had rejoined her. "Hey, good-looking, these dolls in swimsuits - how 'bout a tour of the rest of the party, umm?"

A wet woman nearby piped up, told him about the hot tub and hazarded an offer to escort him there. Mansfield, licking dip from his fingers, followed.

"Lovely bash, darling." The unctuous fellow now addressing her was Jack Graft, her district attorney and friend; his psychosomatic and overweight wife was an honorary lifer at Lovecraft Spa, Inc. "Tell ya, that Rambler's some character, eh? Took fortitude, baby, invitin' him here. I like that - a gamey wench, ah, ha, ha. 'Course we all can see he's unscrewed on drugs, right?" He winked and laughed again. "Ha, ha."

Mingling, she encountered others who shared decided impressions on the subject, then she ran into Ace King, Jack, standing by the bathroom door, obviously waiting to be invited in for a nose treat. She said hi. He stared at her outfit, and she moved on.

Thathaway was a couple of couples up the hall. He had a cute swingle cornered and having said he felt parties were fundamentally entropic, was presently expaining to her the second law of thermodynamics. "Time reduces all orderly systems to their inevitable states of maximum chaos. Entropy, the direction of disorder, rather defines time - and parties, I think. How's your drink coming?" He was engrossed; Lovecraft moseyed past.

She discovered Rambler in a full lotus in a corner of her bedroom, apparently meditating. Ever so remotely, she felt a pang, as once she had nearly sincerely found his queer buddhism - "quaint." The ping silenced instantly, and she nudged him with the open toe of one of her spikes.

"Nash!"
 "Mona."
 "Hey, sport."
 "Hey, champ."
 "How's the shoulder?"
 "There is a story. Lo Chin had studied for years under Tsing-Tsang yet could not apprehend buddha-mind. One moonlit night, she carried water in a pail that leaked. Tsing-Tsang said, 'The water is gone from the pail.' Lo Chin said, 'The moon is gone from the water.' Tsing-

Tsang beat her cruelly with his staff. At that moment, she became free."

"Quaint, Rambler. Now let me tell you something. You can take your motley crew and pack on out of here - immediately! - because, otherwise, if you don't -"

As she paused to imagine her threat, Drumm, adorned by a lampshade, wassailed in singing, "Bo de doe." In the distance, she could hear splashing, screams and the sound of shattering.
