Alumni Society meeting stresses memberships and communication

By Pat O'Leary

The Constituent Alumni Society officers want soon-to-be graduates and recent graduates to join the society and also want better communication and financial positions within the societies, according to about 50 officers who met Saturday for the first Constituent Alumni Leadership Day.

The constituent societies are made up of UNL alumni who have formed their own groups and take particular interest in their respective colleges. Twelve societies were represented at the four-hour meeting.

Jack Miller, executive vice president of the Alumni Association, outlined the members' goals. In order to become the best alumni association in the country, Miller said, they need to be responsive to the needs of UNL alumni, to improve the quality of education at UNL and to secure a sound financial base.

Members also agreed that their communication problems could be lessened if a grassroots effort was made to gain alumni involvement. Participation and communication with the administration seems less important than communication with the deans and alumni boards, said Homer Puderbaugh, faculty liaison for the College of Architecture.

To encourage membership among recent graduates, the members said they must reach students while they are still in school. Annual parties for graduating seniors, which are already given by a few societies, would familiarize the student with the alumni associations and would give the students the opportunity to join early, Sharon Waldo, president of the College of Home Economics Alumni Association, said.

The societies want to provide scholarship and internship opportunities, as well as help with job placement.

UNL Chancellor Martin Massengale and David Brooks, a UNL chemistry professor, spoke at the meeting.

Massengale told the members that the university has in some way failed if graduates do not feel close to the university.

"Once a member of this university, you should always feel like a member," he said.

This is a difficult time for higher education, Massengale said. He reminded the group that the university has had to take 2 percent and 3 percent budget cuts in the last two years. The university has suffered from state revenue shortfalls, he said.

Graduates get the first year of their membership to the alumni association free, and the second year for half price. The cost is now $16 for national dues and about $3 for constituent society dues. That amount is expected to increase to $25 for national dues and $5 for constituent dues by 1985, Julie Elmen, director of the constituent societies, said. The discounted amounts may be extended for two or three years.
