Raglin: NU tuition beats inflation

Tuition costs have steadily increased the past few semesters, yet NU students are paying a smaller percentage of the university's total operating costs than they did in 1973, according to budget figures prepared by Central Administration.

In fact, despite complaints from students, NU's tuition has proven to be an inflation beater.

Since 1973, tuition has risen from $18 per credit hour for both undergraduate and graduate instruction to $35.38 for undergraduate and $40.15 for graduate instruction.

In 1973-74, tuition was 12.7 percent of the total budget and this year, tuition is 7.8 percent of the total budget.

At UNL, $20 million was raised in tuition this fiscal year. UNL received $80 million from the state and $33 million from federal funds. The UNL budget also includes $72.3 million in revolving funds, such as continuing studies, residence halls and cafeterias and student services; and $15.1 million from trust funds such as research grants and contracts.

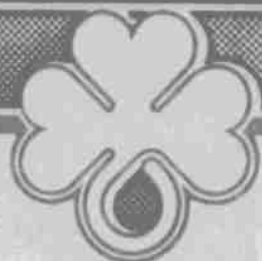

NU's central administration compared tuition increases with the rate of inflation shown in the Consumer Price Index. The study reveals a lag between the amount students pay in tuition and the amount the university has to pay to do business, Jim Raglin, NU director of public affairs, said.

The consumer price index increased 212 percent from 1973-74, while student tuition increased 179 percent during that same period.

John Goebel, vice chancellor for business and finance, said the university "is evaluating the current economic situation and will attempt to keep tuition at an appropriate level."

The university will continue to try to attract federal funds through research grants, Goebel added.
