

Election. . .

One would only hope that the Daily Nebraskan editorial staff should never be unfair to any of its patrons. The student body should react negatively to that editorial by voting en masse for the Action Party candidates March 16.

DN 'biased' toward Reach

In the recent election for ASUN Senate, I realized that the Daily Nebraskan was allotted a certain percentage of student fees. Well, this was all fine and good; I believe, or did believe, this university paper was a great medium for student ideas and expression. However, during this last election the Daily Nebraskan was definitely biased toward the Reach Party campaign, and it showed in almost every article. Several times they misquoted Action candidates and I have, no idea whether the same misquoted facts showed up dealing with other party campaigns. But the DN did in fact, seem to inevitably side with Reach on almost every issue from a student standpoint.

I realize this newspaper has every right to side with a party, but the day of the election a huge article exclaiming Reach to be the main runner in the election was the only article dealing with ASUN party platforms. I was surprised that a student newspaper that seems to be the main source of information on student issues would take advantage of their power to publish the day of elections. The article issued in Wednesday's paper was definitely personal opinion and turned out to be a farce since the campaign is still running neck and neck. From what I can see, the Action Party never had a chance with the voters who have been reading the Daily Nebraskan for the last few months.

In conclusion, I voted against allotting student fees to the Daily Nebraskan because I don't feel my money should help support the Daily Nebraskan's opinion on electoral campaigns.
