Telephone line on hold

Plans to hook residence hall phones to the university low-cost line have been put on hold until questions about the plan's legality have been settled.

Ruth Michalecki, director of telecommunications at UNL, said in 1981 the Federal Communications Commission made it legal for large organizations such as hotels and universities, to share or sell their long distance networks.

The September hookup date, or any future hookup, has been delayed because the Nebraska Department of Administrative Services questioned UNL's right to offer the service.

Compared to direct dialing costs, the university line would save students 20 to 25 percent on their in-state calls.

"It was a perfect marriage," Michalecki said. Administration offices and students generally use the phones for long distance calls at opposite times of the day, she said.

"We're not interested in reselling long distance to our students," she said. Letters were sent to students during the summer informing them of the new service. Students were told they would not have a monthly charge or a sign up fee.

Almost 100 percent of the students responded in favor of the plan, she said. "Hundreds of parents called to say what a great thing it is we're doing for the students."

Michalecki said she sees the delay as a "temporary roadblock."

"We're making an honest, true effort to save the students money."
