

English professor earns scholar's grant

Charles Mignon, UNL English professor, received a $28,000 grant to support his editing work on an 18th century manuscript.

Mignon received the grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities to support his editing a 276-year-old manuscript written by Edward Taylor, a prominent American poet of the Colonial period.

Additional funds and services are being provided by the UNL English department, the College of Arts and Sciences, and the offices of UNL Chancellor Martin Massengale and John Strong, vice chancellor of academic affairs.

The Taylor manuscript is regarded as an important literary find. Mignon hopes to have it published several years from now by the Modern Language Association of America.

Mignon has been working on the 846-page manuscript for five years. It is a collection of 36 sermons delivered by Taylor between 1693 and 1706 on the theme of the types of the Old Testament. The manuscript was discovered in the library of a Nebraska City family several years ago.

Gade said the department does not have total control over the phone installation. After plans are approved, money must be budgeted by the university for the phones.

Fey said that the department has been disappointed with the phones that have been installed. He said prank calls have presented more problems than anticipated and that there has been some vandalism to the phones.

Fey said that until phones are installed on East Campus, students should use the emergency number, 911, in a phone booth. No money is required to dial the number.

Additional lighting was installed during the summer at the Law College to improve the area's safety, Grounds Department Director Wilbur Dasenbrock said. No other lights were installed on campus because of budget cuts, he said.

Dasenbrock said his department has asked for money to improve lighting on campus but has not received enough. He said he has requested for five years that money be budgeted for installation of lights and sidewalks by the East Campus 38th Street entrance, but no money has been budgeted.
