Students get firsthand experience with children at Staples Laboratory

Students at the Ruth Staples Laboratory are given an opportunity to learn firsthand how to work with children.

There are two programs at the East Campus laboratory: day care and nursery.

Children in the day care program are children of UNL students or personnel. The nursery school is open to the public. The day care center is open Monday through Friday from 7:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. while the nursery school children attend two or three half-day sessions each week.

Helen Sulek, director of the laboratory, said the instructors try to provide a program for all aspects of a child's development. This program is not only for cognitive development but also social and physical development.

The instructors in the lab consist of a head teacher who is a member of the faculty in the Department of Human Development and Family, several graduate assistants who serve as teaching assistants, and students who are enrolled in Human Development courses.

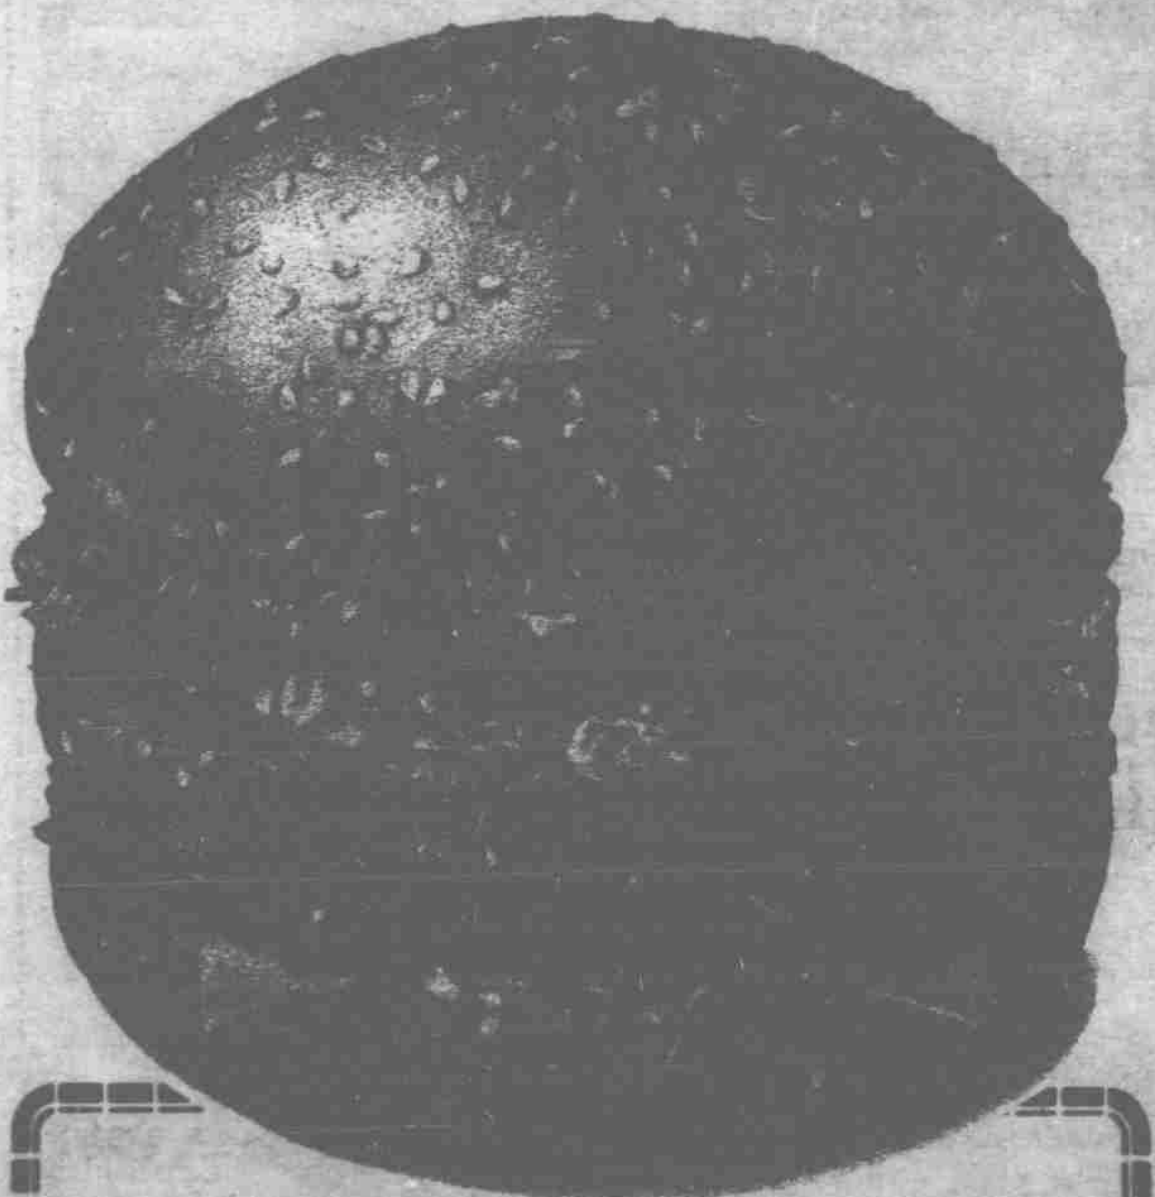

Sulek said this lab provides students an opportunity to learn about human behavior — from themselves, other adults and the children.

"You can see human behavior in pure form because children are very open," Sulek said.

"The programs with the children try to have a balance between quiet and active," Sulek said. The children are outside about every day, she said, and a new playground is being built for them, but funds still are needed.
