UNL offers choices

I'd like to comment on the guest opinion titled "Religion courses beneficial," which appeared in the Sept. 20 issue of the Daily Nebraskan.

Mark Westphal makes clear his interest in having Christianity classes a mandatory part of the UNL educational system so that we can let the "Bible teach (us) principles and solutions that address many of man's contemporary questions and problems." He goes on to quote phrases from Moberly, saying the university of today is atheistic, and not teaching Christianity is being against it.

It appears to me, nothing could be more simplistic or further from the truth. The university is a smorgasboard of different types of religious preferences. There are churches on campus to serve students who chose to go, as well as religious organizations everywhere that are active. God only knows the number of times different preachers or organizations have given us their pitches near Broyhill Fountain, each one of them claiming to have all the right answers.

UNL also offers plenty of opportunity to take classes on religion; just look in the 1983-84 schedule of classes. However, Westphal doesn't want you to make a choice, he wants to force you into taking a class in his particular religion: Christianity.

It appears to me Westphal's motivation to teach us the Bible clearly stems from his own religious zealotness of which I thank the university I can choose not to be a part of.
