Rest of story

OK, enough is enough. In the first place, LeAnn Remmers (Daily Nebraskan, Oct. 18), parking control officers are not police officers. They have no commission, power of arrest, or police training. Basically, they only write parking tickets. This whole thing does not involve police officers.

Secondly, it is an unsettled matter of opinion as to whether any discrimination took place. As a female who has worked in the UNL Police Department for more than five years, I personally could tell a lot of people the other side of this story, but no one bothered to ask the rest of the women who work here. A minority have been allowed to smear the name of our department. Isolated incidents taken out of the long-term context of events can appear quite distorted.

Third, you don't know how qualified anyone over here may be. You don't work with us every day. I keep the time and attendance records. I have typed up productivity charts.

Finally, LeAnn, I would hope that if you plan to be a police officer, you learn to get all the facts before you pass judgment. And don't believe everything you read in the papers.

Current topics

I would like to express my disappointment in your article about hybridization of animals (Daily Nebraskan, Oct. 14). When I read an article, I expect to find something that will pertain to my understanding of the issue or topic. Hybridization of domestic livestock is an important issue to livestock producers, but the article contained only historical information that could be found in outdated textbooks.

I have been actively involved in agriculture all my life and sincerely appreciate the Daily Nebraskan's work to report on agricultural issues. My greatest disappointment in attending UNL though, has been realizing how uneducated the general public is about agriculture. I believe the Daily Nebraskan should center its agricultural coverage around current topics so that everyone will be able to develop a general understanding of agriculture. When we distort the importance of agriculture by uninformative articles and meaningless drawings, we lose the interest of people not directly associated with ture.
