Not all in the record

I guess it is too bad that some women want to be stepped on by men the rest of their lives. As for me, I choose to fight for what I believe in and I believe that a secretary behind a desk doesn't know the first thing about a police department job.

Parking control officers are and will be police officers. Are they not named under the UNL police department? Look at the dictionary and see what the definition of a police officer is. It says a policeman or a policewoman is a member of a police force or department.

I think it is you, Sharman Bushing (Daily Nebraskan, Oct. 19), who judged too quickly. If you are so quick to respond, why don't you tell us what the press is holding back and put your job on the line. The public is interested in what you have to say, but as a secretary, do you really know from keeping books and attendance records what really is happening? It would help to get the real facts besides judging from attendance records.

Refusal also violation

First, I'd like to compliment Lauri Hopple and the Daily Nebraskan for the recent series on Driving While Intoxicated among UNL students. The series was accurate, timely and potentially helpful to many people.

Secondly, I'd like to elaborate on the remarks attributed to me (Daily Nebraskan, Oct. 18). I was quoted as saying that some UNL students felt it was better to refuse a chemical test than to have a DWI on the record. I should have added that refusing a chemical test is an additional violation subject to prosecution. More importantly, state law requires the Department of Motor Vehicles to suspend the individual's drivers license for 12 months. There are no exceptions or provisions for work, school or other driving.

This is automatic and does not require a conviction for refusing the chemical test. I am not qualified to practice law and this comment should not be taken as legal advice. But I do believe individuals should understand the potential consequences of refusing a chemical test.
