Changes in city's pollution ordinance puts enforcement in local hands

Lincoln has started cleaning up its act. Otis Sunderman, air, noise and occupational health supervisor with the Lincoln-Lancaster County Health Department, said Lincoln's Air Pollution Control Ordinance and related regulations are currently being revised to comply with federal and state guidelines. He said the changes will enable the local health agency to retain enforcement of federal government rulings. If the city had not made the changes in its regulations, he said, the state would have to enforce the Environmental Protection Agency's laws.

Sunderman said he doesn't think any of the changes being made are that significant. Most of the changes either lessen the department's paperwork or don't apply to Lincoln, he said.

Sunderman said suggested changes include a parking lot regulation that requires every parking lot with more than 500 stalls be analyzed periodically for air quality. Another regulation subject to change is the limit on smokestack height. This regulation has no local application since no industry in Lincoln emits a significant amount of sulfur to adversely affect the environment, he said.

The air pollution ordinance is periodically updated according to how the federal government changes its regulations, Sunderman said. The last change in the ordinance was made two years ago when a fee for health department services was initiated.

Sunderman said an advisory board now will present the suggested changes to the Lincoln-Lancaster County Board of Health. If the board approves the changes, it will present the proposal to the Lincoln City Council and the Lancaster County Board of Commissioners for final adoption.

Sunderman said he expects that the proposals will pass both the council and the Board of Commissioners without any problem.
