Adversary . . .

 Lind said that the teams perceived the adversary system as the fairest, even though there were many similarities purposely introduced between the two groups. Lind said the attorneys of both groups followed orders from him, both court settings had the same tone, both courts had the same outcome.

Ratings of fairness increase with the amount of imput people believe they are allowed to contribute to their defense, either through their attorneys, or themselves, Lind said. Even when the case is lost, he said, if people feel they have been able to contribute to their defense they will consider the system fair.

However, Lind said that fairness should not be the only goal of a judicial system. He said that other criteria should be used, such as whether evidence will be biased or not.

Lind said that studies show the non-adversary attorneys to be less biased than the adversary attorneys.
