

Husker cagers . . .

Hill said she couldn't think of any better player to trust the game to.

"Obviously, Crystal is one of the people we'd like to have the ball in a tight situation," Hill said. "I was pleased that she took the leadership."

Coleman, who led the Huskers with 26 points, treated the point surge as just another day at the office.

"I felt that it was my job to get the ball up and down the court and get the transition game going," Coleman said.

Freshman Angie Miller added 17 points and eight rebounds to the Husker cause. Playing the pivot position, Miller was the beneficiary of several of Coleman's passes.

Coleman was named co-MVP of the invitational along with CMU's Sylvia Odum, who scored 23 points against the Huskers. Both were named to the all-invitational team along with Miller, Kristy Burns of South Florida and Robin Holmes of Cal-State Fullerton. Cal State-Fullerton won the consolation game, defeating South Florida 86-57.

Fanatical . . .

But then the game started and our behavior started changing. Oklahoma's opening drive wasn't too bad, and UNL scored on its first drive. But, much to my dismay, the Sooners came right back and evened the score.

The Huskers' touchdown before halftime tied the score, but by then the adrenaline level was overflowing.

We spent halftime yelling back and forth about what would happen in the next two quarters. Then, the third quarter started and so did Bob's twitches. By the end of the game he looked like the lead singer for Madness. The next two touchdowns were followed by a flurry of high fives. We slapped more palms than the Louisville Cardinals basketball team.

On the Sooner final drive, we were all holding our hands over our hearts, and hyper-ventilating. The saving play by Neil Harris brought on a group hug, and another set of high fives.

By now I'm in a semi-calm state. My heart is starting to slow down and my face should stop itching sometime before finals period. By Christmas break the game will be just another memory.
