Brown . . . Beating odds . . .

"I just think Kerry thought he had to be a starter and had to be a star," Brown said.

One of the other problems Boagni had with the Kansas program was the resignation of assistant Coach Jo Jo White. White had been under consideration for the head coaching job after Ted Owens was fired.

"Jo Jo and me were like big brother and little brother," Boagni said. "It upset me and I was deeply hurt. It left a scar that will never go away. He'd always been there for me and all of the sudden, 'bam,' he was gone."

Both Brown and Boagni said they hold no animosity toward one another. Both said they'd like to see the other succeed.

"I have nothing but good thoughts about Kerry," Brown said.

"I don't have anything against Coach Brown," Boagni said. "I made the decision I made for me. They're (Kansas) going to be great. I've got a lot of friends on the team and I want them to do well."

Brown said the loss of Boagni was not the only significant one to the Kansas program. Season assist leader Hunter failed to reach the required grade point average to maintain his athletic eligibility.

"Losing Cedric was a real blow," Brown said. "He was making great strides as a player. He fit into the system extremely well."

Brown said Hunter is in school and should be eligible next season. The return of Hunter could be a key to a successful season next year for the Jayhawks, Brown said.

Brown spent two seasons at UCLA prior to moving on to the New Jersey Nets of the National Basketball Association. He moved to the Kansas post last April after guiding the Nets to the NBA playoffs. Brown said he enjoyed most his experience at UCLA.

"It took me awhile to get things together at UCLA," Brown said. "One advantage I had there that I don't have here is that the kids at UCLA believe they can win. Our kids here doubt themselves. They haven't had a lot of success."

Despite moving on to Nebraska, Miller still stays in close contact with Steinmeyer and the Wilber girls' basketball team.

It's a lot different not being on the team anymore, but in some ways I'm even closer to them now," Miller said. "I really enjoy watching them play."

Steinmeyer said that Miller has gone as far as playing a game at 5:15 in Lincoln and driving to Wilber in time to watch her old teammates play.

One adjustment Miller has had to make is getting used to playing against taller opponents. Miller said she was always the tallest player in high school, but at Nebraska Miller is often two to three inches shorter than the opposing center. Hill said Miller has adjusted to the disadvantage by playing her own game.

"Angie handles it (the height disadvantage) by playing a steady game," Hill said. "She knows her limitations and she's very cool-headed on the court. That's rare for a freshman."

Although Steinmeyer and Hill believe Miller has a lot of potential, she's taken a humble approach to her game. When told that Steinmeyer predicted she'll eventually make the All-Big Eight team, Miller simply laughed and said, "I've got a lot to learn."

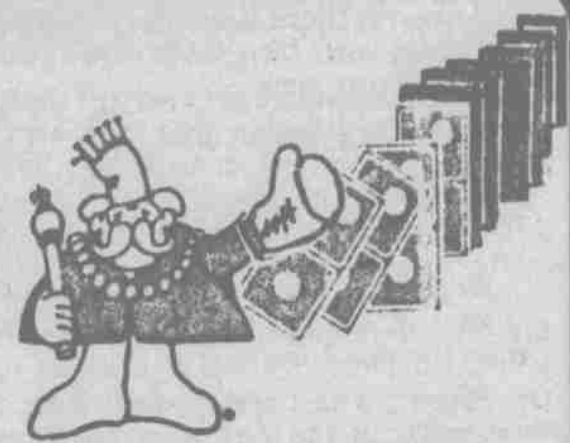

"The thing about Angie is that she doesn't know how good she's going to be," Steinmeyer said. "But she'll still try to be the best."

Another adjustment Miller has had to deal with is the demand basketball and academics have made on her time.

"I really don't have much time for anything but basketball and studying," Miller said. "Having to do both makes you learn discipline. You know when you've got to study."

While Miller has made a big impact on Nebraska's women's basketball team, it doesn't equal the mark she made on the town of Wilber.
