Women's basketball team loses to nationally-ranked Wildcats

By Ward Triplett

Kansas State's women's basketball team, to use a slightly overused phrase from its own press guide, has it all this year. Their height makes them one of the tallest teams in the country, their speed, even along the frontline, is superior to any conference team and their depth is the best Nebraska Coach Kelly Hill said she had seen this season.

Therefore, neither Kansas State Coach Lynn Hickey nor Hill seemed too surprised after the 11th-ranked Wildcats defeated Nebraska 95-75 Saturday in Manhattan, Kan.

The Wildcats had five scorers in double figures, outrebounded the Huskers 52-31 and outshot them 59 percent to 39 percent.

Intimidation played a key role, Hickey said.

"Of course they (Nebraska) were a little intimidated," Hickey said. "Why shouldn't they have been? We have a national ranking, taller players and we were playing on our home floor."

Nebraska had its only lead, 3-2, when Stacy Imming connected on a 18-foot jumper with one minute gone. The Wildcats scored the next 10 points, all of the baskets coming from within 10 feet.

Debra Powell scored five of Nebraska's next nine points, and Imming again hit from outside to close the lead to 16-12 with just more than 12 minutes to play. But Kansas State again used its height advantage inside (6-1 forwards Jennifer Jones and Angie Bonner and 6-3 Tina Dixon against 5-9 Powell, 5-8 Imming and 5-10 Angie Miller) to score 10 of the next 12 points.

In the process, the Wildcats limited Nebraska to only two defensive rebounds in the game's first 16 minutes.

"We got outrebounded again," Hill said. "They box out very well. We're missing some important people on our team that could help us there, but we're still unable to convert the outside shot."

Kansas State led 44-29 at halftime and pushed that lead to 62-37 before Nebraska scored 12 consecutive points in a three-minute span. Nebraska twice had chances to cut the lead to 11, with more than 10 minutes to play, but both possessions ended in turnovers.

The regrouped Wildcats then went back underneath for easy baskets as Cindy Durham, Bonner, guard Sheronda Jenkins and Dixon all scored from within eight feet as the Big Eight's co-leaders pulled away again.

"We were half-court trapping, and the trap was working," Hill said about the comeback.

"The people they had in there weren't adjusting to it and they were just giving us the ball," she said.

Hickey praised the Huskers' comeback, but blamed it partly on a letup by her team.

"They were just flying up the court all night, and when they're hot, they're going to be trouble," Hickey said. "If they were cold in the second half like they were in the first, it wouldn't have been any problem. But they are a good team, and I promise you they will be tough to beat up there (in Lincoln)."

Landmann said she has made a quick adjustment to Nebraska. She said she likes the people she has met but doesn't like the weather.

"I've settled down very quickly," Landmann said. "Coach Devaney has been a big help."

Nebraska's women and men will compete Saturday in the Husker Invitational at the Bob Devaney Sports Center. No team scores will be kept in a meet that will feature the Villanova track team. Villanova still holds the world record it set in the distance medley relay at the Husker Invitational two years ago.
