

Find out what's cooking in International Food Fest

By Kelli Kellogg

Food is one of the foremost concerns of the world, in terms of both politics and basic survival. That is why students from eight nations — including Mexico, Korea, Taiwan, the United States, the Philippines and Japan — will present the International Food Fest Thursday at the East Union's Great Plains Room, said the coordinator of the event, Foster Owen.

Owen, a UNL professor and extension dairyman, said the festival should show people how important food is to the world. The Institute of Agriculture and Natural Resources sponsors the event.

One of the programs scheduled for the festival, Owen said, is a quiz bowl that pits student teams from different UNL organizations against each other as they try to answer questions about the food brought to the festival. The students will bring food from five nations, he said.

"We hope it gets students interested in what the foods around the world are like," he said, "and what is involved in food processing and trade around the world."

Questions in the quiz bowl also will center on exhibits and demonstrations that the students present.

Kaz Imakawa, a Japanese graduate student, said about 50 students will perform everything from Japanese martial arts to Mexican hat dances at the festival.

The students ran into problems when they tried to organize the festival, Imakawa said. He said that since the students didn't belong to actual foreign-student groups, they had to form them to set up the festival.

Since students were from different departments, he said, communications were sometimes poor.

Also featured at the festival will be speaker Vernon Larson, director of international agriculture programming at Kansas State University in Manhattan, Kan.

The festival will be from 4 p.m. to 9 p.m. and will be free to the public, except for the food. Owen said the students possibly will sell food tickets, costing about 25 cents each.
