School for the deaf...

Weverka said deaf leaders also become leaders in the general society. They form associations like the Nebraska Association of the Deaf and the Omaha Association of the Deaf. They get signing put on television programs and help get telephones for the deaf installed so deaf people are better linked to the hearing population. They help bring deaf people into the larger community.

But this large community of deaf and hearing people is easily broken down. Weverka said the recent controversy about the state school has labeled deaf people in a negative way. He said some people seem to wonder if a deaf person on the street is from "that school."

"We're being looked at as if we are animals," he said. "All the bad things (about the school) are being put on the front page of the newspaper and all the good things in the middle."
