SWAP...

If SWAP did indeed change people's views of others on campus, or at the very least reconfirm and solidify previously supposed views, for the 26 who participated, what could a swap exchange do for the rest of the thousands who live and work at UNL? Does Operation SWAP have to be confined to one week of the year? Although the organization of anything more encompassing than this year's SWAP would be difficult if not impossible for a group like Innocents to manage, an informal ongoing swap of ideas and viewpoints between students and administrators can only build on the success of SWAP '84.

The more time and energy spent on getting to know the individuals behind the bureaucratic or student masks, the better will be the communication and understanding between the various groups and institutions. In a university setting, where the opposing views of groups and institutions seem to collide regularly, this kind of getting down to basics in communication can only improve the educational system for all of us.

It seemed evident to me that the stereotypic view of "insensitive institutional bureaucrats" often verbalized by students did not persist when personal and meaningful relations were experienced with an individual who happens to be an UNL administrator at a given point in time. Most readers could quickly list a dozen or more similar situations within our campus community where lack of personal contact and communication contributes to misunderstandings. With the sincere belief that education is truly enhanced through interaction and sharing, my hope is that the success of this year's Operation SWAP can now move from a modest number of participants to include a more representative sample of our pluralistic campus community. Each of us, in my judgment, will become more complete human beings and more effective campus citizens to the extent that we are able to reach out and learn from others. The creators and sponsors of Operation SWAP should be commended for their fine efforts in moving all of us who participated in a healthy direction.
