Film, fashion...

John Travolta ignited the disco craze during the late '70s in Saturday Night Fever. Starlight ballrooms opened up everywhere to accommodate young men sharply clad in white three-piece polyester suits and black high-heeled shoes. The disco fad totally swept the country for three years, and Saturday Night Fever catapulted John Travolta to stardom.

Flashdance is the latest Hollywood film to affect popular fashion. It has spawned a wave of torn sweatshirts and legwarmers. It has got to be a trend because there is no way that some of the people wearing these items possibly could be dancers. And I don't care whether Jennifer Beals did her own thing or not.

Film critic Roger Ebert purports that Liquid Sky is the next big cult film, especially as far as punk fashion is concerned. Anne Carlisle, who plays Margarine, is lasciviously photogenic. Her bleached blond hairdo is complimented by different colors of facial day-glo makeup and wild, feathery dresses. Reportedly thousands of people on both coasts are flocking to see Liquid Sky, and it will be interesting, indeed, to find out what impact the film has on local style.

Thus, Hollywood affects the way we look and dress more than we may realize and whether we like it or not.
