Indian station receives permit

The first commercial television station in the country to be owned and operated by an American Indian corporation took one more step off the drawing boards this week.

In a ceremony in the Washington, D.C., office of Federal Communications Commission chairman Mark Fowler, Wallace Coffey, chairman of the Native American Communications Corporation board, received an FCC construction permit enabling the corporation to begin building a UHF station which will serve the Lincoln area.

"In addition to our commercial activities, we expect to have facilities to train Native Americans to broadcast production and to provide job opportunities for them," Coffey said.

Frank Blyth, president and chief executive officer of the corporation, said that although Native American tribes and organizations now own some radio stations, they have no television stations as yet. "The NACC station will be commercial and in a major market area," he said.

The NACC filed an application in October 1982 to construct, own and operate the commercial television facility. Construction and start-up costs are projected at $5 million. The station will be built over the next 18 months, with financing secured from a number of lending institutions. The corporation is also open to other outside investors.

The NACC is a profit corporate subsidiary of the Native American Public Broadcasting Consortium of Lincoln. The officers and board of directors are native Americans, with extensive radio and television experience. Coffey, a Comanche Indian, has 12 years of broadcast experience, spanning 25 years of management in commercial radio and public television.
