Another problem, Longacre said, is that some professors give the same tests semester after semester, which can have good and bad consequences, he said. Once, a geography professor gave the same test for four consecutive semesters, then changed it. Longacre said most of the people who took the test did poorly because they had expected to take the same test.

"If you're going to rely on just the test to get you through, there is a lot of danger involved," he said.

Hayman also said students will lose if they use the exam file as their only study tool.

"Students should use exam files only as an emergency situation," Hayman said. "It is designed for people who get into binds or if a student didn't get a chance to study."

Hayman said signs will be posted in Selleck that say the exam file is not intended to be a substitute for studying.

Jantzi said she thinks the exam file is good, but using it for cheating will not help students. Also, she said exam files should not be criticized, because professors use the same tests.

"If the professor doesn't want a student to use the same test, he shouldn't make up the same tests," she said. "Sooner or later, the student is going to catch on to what's happening regardless of if there is an exam file."

UNL Housing Director Doug Zatechka said he was not aware of the new exam file at Selleck, and said that while he is not sure the exam file violates UNL policy, he does not like it.

"If this violates university policy, housing is not going to be a part of it," Zatechka said.

The housing director said that none of the Selleck residents contacted him about starting an exam file, and he is going to investigate the matter.

Hayman said he assumed that if UNL Greek houses used exam files they were within UNL policy. And, he said that current Selleck president Kevin Rogers suggested that residence students work together through the Residence Hall Association to combine and organize exams.

"With a little more time, we believe that we can have an exam file as good as some of the Greek houses," Hayman said.
