

Bookstore officials say students can buy early to avoid crowds, lines

Long lines, high prices and out-of-stock materials can make back-to-school book buying a nightmare.

According to two Lincoln bookstore employees, following a few tips makes book buying a little more pleasant.

"Students should shop early, before classes start. That way they avoid the long lines of the first day," said Mark Oppgaard, Nebraska Bookstore manager. "Buying used books is a good idea, too. Students should also be sure to hold on to all the receipts, so assuming the book is brought back in the same condition it was bought in, it will be easy to get a refund."

Doris Siems, a UNL Bookstore employee said buying early may cause problems.

"One thing that we noticed, especially in freshman classes, is that people who buy early often get the wrong books,"

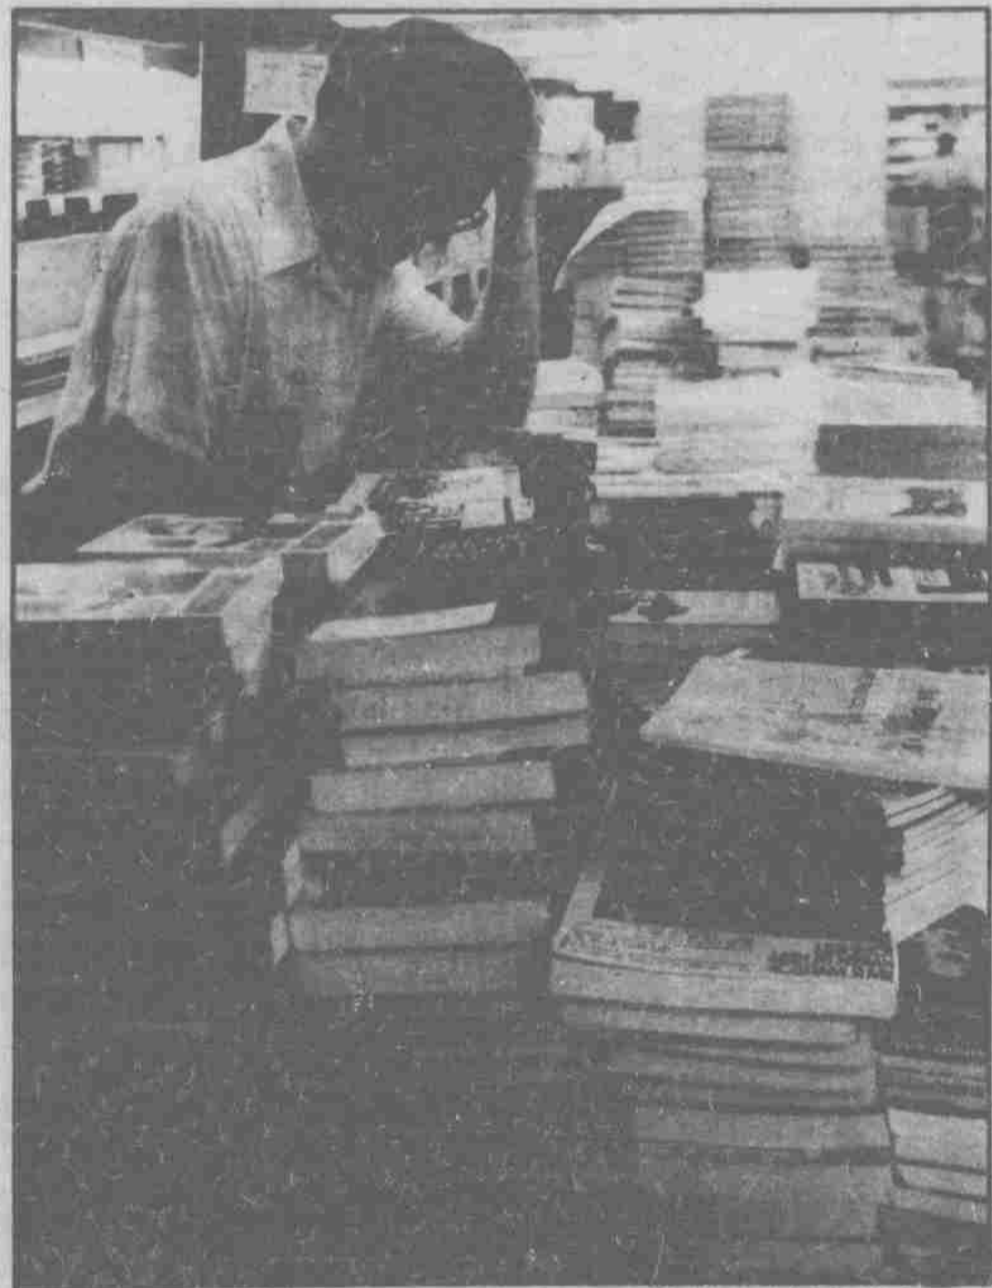

Siems said. "Freshmen should always go to class before coming here. For everyone else, though, they key is to shop early."

Both book stores, in anticipation of the first week rush, make changes to accommodate more customers.

"We set up extra registers and hire more people to help stock shelves and assist customers," Siems said. "Our people are here to help and make suggestions. All you have to do is ask."

Oppgaard said sold-out books are a fairly common problem. But students can do several things if an item they need isn't available.

"The first thing you should do is notify your instructor," he said. "It's possible that they either weren't ordered, or because of transfers there aren't enough to go around. There's also a slight chance of picking up a book that someone has returned."

Jim Belman, a University Bookstore employee, ponders over the many books he has to stack. The shelves are expected to be depleted next week.
