

Historical Society...

Welsch, UNL professor of English and anthropology, said there was no election, but only a vote on whether to accept the committee's proposal.

Welsch, who has advocated changes in the society in the past, said this goes against the American way.

He said Society members were asked to vote on people hand-picked by the board and Kivett.

"This is a question of parliamentary procedure," said Kay Graber, a UNL staff member and member of the society.

UNL English Professor Robert Haller was the society member who nominated the alternate slate. He said that even though the Historical Society is a private organization, it operates mainly on funds appropriated by the state legislature. Since the society is maintained by taxpayers' dollars, he said, it should act within the laws governing public meetings and conform to the Nebraska constitution.

When Harl Dalstrom, a member of the nominating committee, learned of the election procedure, he said he was baffled and confused about what parliamentary procedure would have prevailed. He said the voting procedure chosen was peculiar and he did not understand how it came about.

Faulkner, who steered the voting format, said "the election was conducted properly and in accordance with the wishes of the members, as is evidenced by the presence of majority votes."

The voting procedure was outlined well in advance and no objections were made, Kivett said.

Kivett said he agrees there is a need for a new voting procedure. He said all society members, not just those present at the meeting, should be allowed to vote.

Membership on the board should be representative of all three Nebraska congressional districts, according to population, Kivett said. He said the society's constitution does not say this, but currently operates this way.
