

Recycling program to finance scholarships

When UNL students throw that "D" exam away after class, they unknowingly benefit themselves in many ways.

That exam, through a new paper recycling program, will not only save natural resources, it will help finance some UNL students' education next year, according to Mark Scudder, ASUN president.

The ASUN-sponsored recycling program, now in its fifth month, nets approximately $30 per month, according to Tom Hansen, manager of Citizens for Environmental Improvement, a non-profit recycling group which started the UNL program. This $30 helps fill ASUN scholarship coffers that will help relieve some students' financial burdens next year, Scudder said.

"The primary purpose of the program is to save resources," Scudder said. "But the money that we do make will probably help pay for scholarships." This will be the first year that ASUN has offered general scholarships for "outstanding" UNL students.

Scudder said the new program has been successful.

"I think saving five tons of trash a month for the past five months is great," he said. "I think it's an excellent start."

CEI representatives pick up trash in 36 UNL departments on both Lincoln campuses. Most of the trash comes from the College of Dentistry and Plant Science Building, both on East Campus. The CEI also picks up trash at Nebraska Wesleyan University and Union College, Hansen said.

Scudder said ASUN plans to double the number of trash "pick-up" points by December.

An ASUN committee, led by Laura Brix, oversees the recycling program.

Who's News

Wes Sime was awarded the Arthur Steinhaus Distinguished Scientist Award at George Williams College in Downers Grove, Ill.

An associate professor in the UNL School of Health, Physical Education and Recreation, Sime is being honored for his achievements in stress physiology and stress management.

Steinhaus developed techniques for progressive neuromuscular relaxation and was an early mentor for him, Sime said. The award is being given in conjunction with a centennial homecoming celebration at the college.

The University of Nebraska College of Law has elected 15 members of its 1984 graduating class to The Order of the Coif, the national legal honor society. Only the top 10 percent of any graduating class is eligible for membership.

Students elected from Nebraska were Kevin Siebert of Henderson, David Barron, Rick Lange, Greg Perry, Shawn Renner and Alissa Sandlin of Lincoln, Mark Christensen of Lodgepole, Richard Garden Jr. of Norfolk, and Shirley Moninger of Sargent.

Other elected students were Paul Kippley of Alford, Iowa, Patricia Jean Falk of Longmeadow, Mass., Sharon Lapointe of Pleasant, Mich., William Schrank of Luverne, Minn., Douglas Hart of Laurel, Mont., and Larry Hause of Gettyberg, S.D.

Marie Arnot, board member for the Center for Rural Affairs, received a Distinguished Service Award from the National Community Development Society. Arnot is an associate professor of community and regional planning at UNL.

Patricia Cox Crews of UNL's textiles, clothing and design department placed third in the nationwide student paper competition at the American Association of Textile Chemists and Colorists Technical Conference and Exhibition.

The study examined ultraviolet stabilizers as an alternative method for reducing fading and degradation of museum textiles. Twenty-three stabilizers were evaluated on the basis of commercial availability, ability to reduce fading, toxicity, color and solubility. Results showed that the stabilizers reduced fading in about 50 percent of the specimens.
