

Envoy favors disarmament

"We don't need more nuclear weapons in Europe, we need less nuclear weapons in Europe," the Swedish Ambassador Count Wilhelm Wachtmeister said.

Wachtmeister said Sweden's position of neutrality allows it to view disarmament and other East/West problems with more detachment than countries aligned on either side.

Wachtmeister said it does not matter how many weapons each side possesses when each can blow the other up several times. He said Sweden favors balanced disarmament, even if it is not "100 percent guaranteed."

"We have to take certain risks in disarmament," he said.

Wachtmeister said there are fewer risks in disarmament than in nuclear proliferation, but added that Sweden does not support unilateral disarmament.

"You don't have to take the hawk by cutting down the dove," he said.

Sweden's neutrality does not mean the country always gets along with the Western and Eastern blocs, Wachtmeister said. The country opposed the United States' actions in Vietnam and recently has voiced disapproval of Soviet submarines in Swedish territory.

Because of the submarines, Wachtmeister said, Swedish/Soviet relations are not as good as they have been, but remain stable.

"When one has problems, one has to keep the channels open," he said.
