Injuries hurt UNL volleyball team, but Husker players keep winning

Terry Pettit is the first to admit he's got problems with his top 10 ranked volleyball team.

The Huskers, who host Iowa State tonight at 7 p.m., lost Sharon Kramer to a broken leg against Iowa State last month. Before a week had passed, her replacement Michelle Smith suffered a stress fracture in her foot in a match against Purdue.

It hurt the system to switch Annie Adamczak, a powerful right side blocker to the Smith-Kramer vacated center position. It also jumbled the reserve rotation to put Enid Schonewise in the starting lineup to take Adamczak's position and move a freshman, Kathi DeBoer, into the top reserve spot. Where the Huskers were once a strong blocking team, they now had to depend on more defense and ball handling. All this in the middle of the season as "the" team everyone in the conference wanted to beat.

But did the Husker stop winning? No.

They did stumble some at a California tournament, winning two, but losing in four to host Santa Barbara and five to Cal Poly San Luis Obispo. But Kansas State, Kansas and Oklahoma have fallen in straight sets, and Missouri, after winning the first game 15-5 Saturday, was also dealt a straight set loss.

"Kramer and Smith were such dominating blockers, we played a lot of balls off the top of the block," Pettit said. But, the Huskers got 25 blocks against the Tigers. Nebraska is the nation's leading hitting team but they were only able to manage a .158 hitting percentage.

"We had been averaging .326 hitting percentage. Yet, we hit .158 against Missouri and still won. I see that as a sign this is a team capable of winning with serving and blocking when its strength (hitting) isn't on. This team has taken on a little different personality (since the injuries) but I know it's convinced it can win," Pettit said.

Iowa State won the first game in its match against Nebraska in Ames, then lost three straight.

"We would like to finish 10-0 in the Big Eight," Pettit said. "But this is an important game for them too. They split with Missouri and Oklahoma. If they win, they can likely get second in the conference. That would mean a first round tournament bye and that they wouldn't be in the same bracket with us."

International 'mini-olympics' break communication gaps

By Mike Reilley

Daily Nebraskan Staff Reporter

Countries from around the globe will be represented at the International Student Games Saturday and Sunday at UNL.

The games are being billed as a "mini-olympics" by its sponsor, the newly-formed International Student Athletic Committee.

The two-day event will feature competition in volleyball, badminton, basketball, bowling, table tennis and 8-ball pool. Trophies are awarded to the top two places in the individual and team categories.

A team trophy also will be awarded to the country that accumulates the most overall points in an ISAC-determined point system.

Students from China, Indonesia, Japan, Korea, Malaysia, Africa, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and the United States are expected to compete.

Rod Merta, program coordinator for International Educational Services at UNL, said the games not only give foreign students a chance to participate in athletics, but breaks a communication gap which forms between them.

"There are a lot of international students on this campus who are interested in sports," Merta said. "And holding the 'mini-olympics' is a good way to bridge international differences. That's what the Olympics are all about."

Merta said many foreign students were enticed to participate after watching the Olympics on television last summer.

Each participant pays a $1 entry fee ($1.50 for bowlers) to help cover trophy and facility rental expenses.

The 8-ball and bowling events will be in the Nebraska Union, while Mabel Lee Hall will be the site of the other four competitions.

Despite being geared toward the international crowd, American students are encouraged to participate.

"We're trying to pull in the American students too," Merta said. "We don't think they should be left out."

ISAC has contacted Selleck Quadrangle and International House about promoting more American participation. Both residence halls showed interest.

"ISAC is aiming for even more American participation in the future," Merta said.

The six events were picked by ISAC because they appeal to a wide range of countries.

"The interest in the events varies from country to country," Merta said. "For example, the Asian students are very much interested in table tennis and badminton, where the Americans like basketball and bowling."

If the "mini-olympics" are a hit, ISAC plans to make it a biannual event, holding meets in the winter and the summer. Merta said soccer and running events will be included in the summer games.
