

New advice column to provide men's point of view for women

Lookout Dear Abby. Make way Ann Landers. You have competition. Here comes "Dear Guy."

Guy LeSage, a 37-year-old writer from Santa Clara, Calif., is marketing his entrepreneur column — "Dear Guy." Although Le Sage's man's advice column is just beginning, he said, he has had the idea for several years.

"I didn't really see anything from man to woman," Le Sage said. "This is the missing link."

Le Sage said he hopes the response to his column will be high enough to run it on a daily basis. He is marketing the column by himself. If things go well, he said, he would "like to see it syndicated in as many papers as possible."

"I'm trying to get the word out that ladies who have questions (about men...) can write in," he said.

UNL surpasses United Way goal, ranks among city's top contributors

By Joan Korinek

During the 1984 United Way campaign, "Give Once and For All," UNL increased donations by 12.2 percent over last year's amount.

Compared to 1983 pledges totaling $72,788, this year yielded $81,701, said John Benson, assistant vice chancellor for academic affairs and United Way coordinator for UNL. Donations still are coming in, he said.

Robert Furgason, vice chancellor for academic affairs and co-chairman of the UNL drive, said the campaign was well-accepted at UNL. It is a tribute to the United Way process that people are willing to give, he said.

"It's a very direct way of an individual making an impact on a whole array of social problems," he said.

At the Lincoln and Lancaster County level, the United Ways surpassed its goal and raised $2,311,825, said Kim Cuda, United Way communications director.

The 62nd annual campaign ran from mid-September to Nov. 1. It was a "very intensive activity," Benson said. Since there were over 200 volunteers involved in the UNL campaign, Benson said, it was a "university wide effort."

"The cooperation we got was great," said Joyce Tyrrel, Benson's secretary who worked directly with the campaign. People gave their time as well as their money, she said.

This is the first year donations were determined by potential giving, Cuda said. A person's giving potential is one hour of pay per month donated to the United Way, she said.

"It's a real fair way to campaign across the board," Cuda said.

Only 18 to 20 percent of Lincoln donates at present, Cuda said. If everyone in the community gave their potential, the United Way would raise between $6 million and $70 million, she said.

Donors have the right to express a preference for how their contribution is used. Although this option has always been available, Cuda said, only about 1 percent took advantage of it. This year the donor option was publicized more, she said, resulting in an increase in the number of contributors indicating preference.

Only a small proportion of UNL donors showed a preference. Tyrrel said she doubted if more than 50 persons indicated donor options.

Eighty-two UNL departments will receive Honor Roll Awards for increasing their contributions by 9 percent or more. "UNL has become much more active in the past few years," Cuda said.

UNL, Goodyear, Burlington Northern and the Lincoln Public Schools employees were the four largest contributors, Cuda said. This is partly because they employ the most people, she said.

There are more than 100 United Way-supported agencies. Research shows that one of every three persons in the community benefits from a United Way agency, Cuda said.
