Council says blood doping illegal

The Reuter News Report

NEW YORK — The chief medical officer of the U.S. Olympic Committee said Tuesday he thought blood transfusions attempting to enhance athletic endurance were not only unethical but illegal from the USOC's standpoint.

Dr. Irving Dardik, chairman of the USOC Sports Medicine Council, said the determination of his investigation into so-called blood doping by between six and nine members of the medal-winning U.S. cycling team "will be that it is illegal."

Dardik told Reuters in a telephone interview that the cyclists, under the administration of a non-USOC physician, underwent a dangerous procedure in which donor blood was used in a last-minute attempt to improve their Olympic performance.

"It wasn't a new technique, but it was hazardous. Our investigation has shown that they used other people's blood in order to facilitate the process. In other words there wasn't enough time to do the normal process..."

mal process..."

The process normally used by athletes is to have some of their own blood removed and treated to increase the number of red blood cells, which carry oxygen and hence boost stamina, and then have that blood put back into their bodies.

The technique used in a hotel room near the Olympic Velodrome near Los Angeles was "done with relative haste. The people responsible for it believed the process (using donor blood) was just as effective," Dardik said.
