Death penalty...

Chambers said that the Nebraska legal system is so inconsistent that the death penalty is really a "lottery of death." Some convicted felons have committed a "more atrocious act" than those on death row, he said.

Eva Harper, whose son Steven is on death row, said she knows criminals on death row who are good people.

"I used to think that people on death row were vicious criminals," Harper said.

Another parent of a death row convict said capital punishment costs the state a lot of money.

Dan Reeves said that the trial and subsequent appeals for his adopted son's first-degree murder conviction have cost $150,000 and his son is only halfway through the appeal process. Reeves said he also testified against the death penalty in 1959, prior to adopting Randy.

Support for the death penalty is at an all-time high in the United States, according to recent polls. But Father John McCaglin, a former pastor from Omaha, asked "even if people want it, should the Legislature lead them to even more violence?"

"Yes," said people who have lost family members at the hands of a murderer.

"I think that any of you, if you had a death in your family, a cold murder, you would feel the same," said Lyle Clark of Lincoln, whose uncle was murdered.

Supporters of the bill said studies show that the death penalty does not serve as a deterrent. Judy Zabel of Lincoln said that it would be a deterrent if would-be felons knew they would die if they killed someone.

"Having the death penalty and not using it is no deterrent at all," Zable said. "If it's true justice we want, then keep the death penalty and use it."

Sen. Elroy Hefner of Coleridge said the death penalty is the state's "major weapon in our fight against violence" and "a necessity."

Foreign debt...

Financial assistance by the United States and other accredited foreign countries through "bridge financing." A "letter of intent" signed by the borrowing country would require them to pay back the loaning country after a specific time.

World markets would be open for trade enabling the less developed countries to eliminate surpluses and increase exports.

Helleman said since the adjustment program was started in 1982, Latin American economies have grown an average of 3.5 percent, foreign countries have grown 4 percent and the U.S. economy has grown 6.7 percent. Helleman said the strategy is working.

"There has been an expansion of economic activity in the foreign market and commercial banks have been giving 'jumbo loan packages,'" she said.

But there still is the underlying assumption that we should still be vigilant and concerned because there is still a huge debt out there," Helleman said. "But the debt crisis is over."
