Pep band....

On that note, here's the suggestions I've wanted to give the UNL band since my freshman year many moons ago. I can't repeat enough just how unaccustomed I am to making music, or to any rules or agreements between the band and the basketball team, so perhaps this isn't possible. But anyway:

1) Eliminate "Great Balls of Fire." It was a cute routine, with those shrill horns and all that jumping around when it started...how many years ago? I thought maybe this was such a grand tradition that people looked forward to it as part of the Big Red games. But at the last game, when I sat in the crowd instead of the press box, the second the drums and horns started up, the eight-year-old next to me stood up and screamed, "My God, they're doing it again!" His mother reached out and comforted him. "Don't worry, it will be over in a little while. I thought you liked the cheerleaders."

2) Learn some new songs. I realize this may be difficult, but after all, since you people are so good (as I'm sure any responses to this column will claim), the least you could do is let us hear the wide range of your talents. You're capable of much better... aren't you?

How about "We're Not Gonna Take It" by Twisted Sister? It's catchy, it's popular and it can't be very hard to learn considering the admitted lack of musical skill by its creators. If you do have time to work on something better, I'd love to hear it.

The few musicians I've encountered here have been good people all right, but extremely defensive when it came to their marching bands and pep bands and so forth. That sharply contrasts us journalism people, who live off criticism. Given that track record and certain other qualities I've associated with them — I fully expect a bizarre response to this. But instead of doing or yelling something rude or obnoxious, like we all expect, why not prove me wrong by showing up Thursday or next Saturday with some new material? That way, you show how silly I am, and some little kid in C23 doesn't have to scream in agony anymore.

Now, of course, comes the hard part. What songs do you, the audience, want to hear? Well, as a special service, just send your song suggestions to the Nebraska Band Office, in the UNL School of Music, or just drop it by Westbrook, room 123.

Of course, I don't expect much to come out of this. I took an informal poll on the pep band Sunday through Tuesday, and came out with such animated responses as "They're just a band," or "They're not...great," and "We have a band? With instruments and everything?" My impression is that no one really cares enough to actually send postage on a suggestion. It's a shame. I would have loved hearing about those new tunes.
