Fricke...

Fricke said he was a little "frustrated" over the regents approval of a new NU vet school. He and Norfolk Regent Margaret Robinson were the only regents opposing the idea.

"You can't vote for one big school and then turn around and cut something from something else — you shouldn't be starting those programs in the first place," he said.

Fricke said he thinks the Legislature will vote down the measure. If it does pass, he said he is confident Gov. Bob Kerrey will veto it.

"The chances of it passing are very little," he said. "The money just isn't there."

Before the regents take any action on either measure, he said, the board will wait first for the Legislature's NU budget decision, expected later this month.

The Legislature gave first-round approval for the bill Thursday.

Overall, Fricke said, his term as regent so far has not left him frustrated and has been what he expected when he decided to run for the position last year. The issues have been challenging, he said.

"I'd like to see things move faster, but if you don't face the issues this year, you'll just have to face them next year," he said.

One of those difficult issues, Fricke said, has been the governor's recommendation for a 3 percent faculty salary increase, while the Legislature's appropriations committee is recommending only a 1.6 percent increase in NU's total budget.

"Again, we'll have to consider program cuts," he said.

By the time his term ends in '91, Fricke said he hopes NU will have "turned the corner."

"By then I hope to have done the things we need to do and maintain the excellency in the university," Fricke said.

He said he plans to run again for a second term in 1991.

Fricke described the university as "very conservative," stemming from his talks with patients, some of whom are parents of UNL students.
