Advice abounds for undeclared

By Loraine Kennedy
Staff Reporter

Over 600 incoming freshmen will have undeclared majors this fall, said Alan Cerveny, assistant director of admissions and advising at UNL.

"There are statistics that show 50-75 percent of all incoming students are undecided to some degree," Cerveny said. Even students who are declared are unsure, and often change their majors, he said.

"There is no stigma attached to being an undeclared student. The University offers such a wide variety, it allows students to explore areas they weren't even aware of," Cerveny said.

Advising services are offered by a professional staff at Admissions and Advising, 108 Administration Building. They serve over 2,000 students per year, with the primary purpose of advising students who haven't chosen a college or a major, Cerveny said.

"We're basically trying to deal with freshmen and sophomore students. We can give general information about any area at the University they might want to look at," he said.

They offer advising in course selection, allowing the student to complete requirements while exploring areas they're interested in, he said.

Cerveny stressed that exploring areas doesn't mean wasted hours. "They can be used as elective hours toward graduation," he said.

For students who are undeclared but enrolled in the College of Arts and Science, there are student-to-student advisers located in the Dean's Office in Oldfather Hall.

The purpose of the program is to put students in touch with Arts and Science advisers, said Anne Kopera, coordinator of advising.

"It's a place for someone who thinks they want to be in Arts and Science, but they don't have to feel committed," Kopera said.

The student advisers are specially chosen, trained and supervised, according to Kopera.

"It's an outreach program," she said. The advisers send letters and make personal contact with their advisees; it is their job to make sure students know what the college requirements are.

During the first semester, student advisers help the students get oriented with the University, Kopera said. The second semester they focus on decision-making, helping the undeclared student make an informed decision in choosing a major, she said.

Advising provides information to new students, Cerveny said.

"Their options are unlimited. Our office is designed to inform students about opportunities that are available to them," she said.
