NCAA rules allow a coach to be a graduate assistant only two years. Since Young's eligibility is used up, Osborne asked him to become the volunteer freshman coach this fall.

Although he will still not directly receive any type of salary for his coaching, Young will maintain a steady source of income through working at the Nebraska Foundation.

"Things are starting to look better," Young said. "The future is getting brighter. It's just another step up the ladder."

Although Young has given up his hopes of earning a master's degree in computer science, he said he originally wanted it to go along with his master's degree he received in 1972 from Reed College in liberal arts. However, Young still has high aspirations.

"I'd like to one day become a head football coach somewhere, hopefully here," he said. "If another opportunity presented itself somewhere else, I might consider it but I'd like to stay right here."
