Humorous essay wins national writing award

By Kris Leach
Staff Reporter

An ability to write and a love of humor won UNL junior, Karen Kramer the 1985 Bedford Prize in Student Writing.

"Kramer said her English professor, Joan Griffin, submitted the approximately 1,500 word essay to the contest last January. When the results came out, Kramer was one of 35 prizewinners selected from more than 2,000 entries from colleges and universities across the nation. Both Kramer and Griffin received cash prizes and certificates.

"The only stipulation was that the essay be written in a freshman level composition course," Kramer said.

Titled, "The Little Drummer Boys," the humorous essay is based on experiences in her high-school band during her senior year. The essay focused on the drummer and percussionist and was an exaggeration of stereotypes one might have of people who play these instruments, Kramer said.

Kramer's essay will be published with other winning essays in two anthologies: "Student Writers at Work: The Bedford Prizes, Second Series" and "Student Writers at Work and in the company of other writers: The Bedford Prizes, Second Series."

Kramer said that she prefers to write humorous essays and plans to major in English. She said her future plans are uncertain, but she hopes to attend graduate school at either Northwestern University or Iowa University and continue her education in creative writing and perhaps someday teach creative writing.
