State Sen. Ernest Chambers of Omaha talks to a group of students during the anti-apartheid rally Friday behind the Nebraska Union.

Chambers: Blacks must fight

CHAMBERS from Page 1

People who oppose a black revolution in South Africa are against blacks because after they gain control, "there might be racial domination," he said. "Those in opposition) say there might be injustice. What is there now?"

Chambers asked.

"What they are afraid of is that black people will learn the lessons that have been taught to us down through the years and apply them to our oppressor, where it would be justified," he said.

If students want to help solve the injustices in South Africa, Chambers said, "they have to begin raising money to help the black people and the few white people in South Africa who are concerned about freedom, to obtain the weapons necessary to fight against the racists in South Africa."

Tours, demonstrations planned

Computing services to be displayed

Chances are that anyone with a question about computing can find an answer this week during the "Computing Extravaganza."

The week-long schedule of activities, sponsored by the UNL Computing Resource Center, is open to all UNL faculty, students and staff members.

Kathryn Alderman, computer education specialist and program coordinator, said activities each day will balance mainframe and microcomputer interests.

Alderman said UNL has services and equipment that people aren't aware of.

"Computing is a hot issue right now," Alderman said. "We'll have a chance to tell them where we're going."

She said the center will offer demonstrations, tours, classes, presentations and discussions about computing possibilities at UNL. Activities are scheduled at different places on campus.

Several demonstrations will cover beginning computing as well as more complex systems used in some UNL classes, Alderman said.

Other activities include:

- The opening of the Faculty Support Center (FASTER), a computer laboratory for UNL faculty and staff members in the Wick Alumni Center.

- Panel discussion on microcomputers in the classroom.

- Tours of the computer-use rooms in Nebraska Hall.

- A presentation by Doug Gale, director of the Computing Resource Center, on computing plans for the future at UNL.

- A discussion with four people working in computer-related fields without computer science degrees.

- A three-hour grand tour for those unable to attend the individual tours scheduled during the week.

Alderman said most events do not require pre-registration. Complete information about the nearly 30 events scheduled is available in the Computing Resources Center, 302 Teachers College.
