

NSSA official encourages student lobbying at Capitol

NSSA's resolution is "the epitome of what NSSA is for," said Pete Castellano, UNL/NSSA delegate.

"It makes one strong argument for the whole state. It's of common interest between schools."

Chapelle said it is important for students to voice their opinion concerning the three percent across-the-board budget cut proposal. Communication to state legislators from students through letters and phone calls is important, she said.

"Their point of view is important. It cannot be duplicated," Chapelle said.

"No one knows what it's like to sit in class, study and work for an education but the students who do it."

Chapelle said she encourages students to lobby at the state capitol today at 1:30 p.m. during the appropriations committee meeting.

"They must realize that their opinions are important. It's their responsibility to let legislators know how they feel. Their opinions make a difference right now," Chapelle said.

In other business, NSSA passed unanimously a resolution introduced by the UNL/NSSA chapter resulting from the Smith Hall women's athletic study facility controversy.

The resolution stated that NSSA and each NSSA chapter represented, in conjunction with campus administrators, form policy for their respective campuses that provides a procedure to ensure student input on all construction, including renovation, of bond funded facilities for student use.

"The bill was introduced because we wanted to see if other campuses had the same problem," said Patty Sokolik, UNL/NSSA delegate. "I think passing the resolution will heighten the level of communication between administration and students."
