Food services cater to the health-conscious

University Food Services and local restaurants are following the growing trend toward healthier eating habits, officials say.

Criticism from students has prompted reduction of the amount of fried foods that are served in university housing, and local restaurants are featuring menu items more acceptable to nutrition-wise customers.

According to Douglas Rix, assistant director of Housing Food Service students are becoming more aware of the need for variety in their daily menus and want the chance to select healthful foods. He said food service employees have tried to remove several fried foods from the menu.

"We're cutting down on frying and featuring more baked foods and casseroles," he said.

Rix said students' complaints about food service partly stem from the frustration and boredom of eating in the same place all the time.

"Students, especially freshmen, often suffer because they're not used to the impersonal institutional environment of a larger food service, so much of the criticism stems from these feelings and is not directly related to the food itself," he said.

Kathleen Lehr, registered dietician at the University Health Center, said she also is seeing a trend in student's nutrition awareness.

"I see a difference each year in the number of students who come in to see me, and I've seen more students in the last five years," she said.

Although Lehr didn't have records available about the number of students she sees, she said she has a full schedule.

Rix said students who express a need for personalized diets are referred to Lehr because food service cannot offer individualized meal plans.

"In a large food service like this, the primary concern is economics, and from there we try to offer as nutritionally balanced meals as possible," Rix said.

Rix said it is important for students to adopt healthy eating habits now because habits they form now most likely will be the same 30 years from now.

Local restaurants also are switching to healthier foods.

Bridge's Restaurant has foods that are low in salt and fat and contain no sugar, said manager Grady Hamm.

"Our whole mission as a restaurant is to offer more healthfully prepared food that is fresh and low in calories," he said.

"We're very much aware that people are focusing on better nutrition, and our trends in sales reflect that," said Darlene Knudson, owner-manager of Pontillos Pizzeria, which serves pizza and sandwiches. Knudson said they have whole wheat buns and have sold more tuna, turkey and vegetarian hoagies than in the past.

Valentino's will have a reduced calorie option on its buffet beginning Friday. Patty Vaughan, marketing director, said the Lifestyle menu will be available in their Lincoln restaurants only.

The Lifestyle menu features a low-calorie pizza sauce for pastas, two low-calorie salads and a low-calorie pizza made with a whole wheat crust.
