Americans pickier about food additives

By Sandy Gordon
Staff Reporter

I had been a waitress for about three months when it finally happened. I got my first truly "nasty" customer.

She couldn't have been more than 10 years old — a mere cherub, I thought. I changed my mind when I brought her oatmeal and she snarled and said "Yuck! I hate it when they put stuff in my food."

Food for Thought

Kids say the darndest...

We both knew the "stuff" she was referring to was the brown sugar on the oatmeal.

In relation to the sugar and salt that manufacturers add to prepared foods to enhance the flavor, it appears Americans are becoming pickier about additives.

Hazel Fox, chairwoman of the human nutrition and food service management department, said manufacturers are preparing foods with less sugar and salt because nutritional publicity influences consumers into changing eating habits.

Because the taste for salt and sugar is acquired we are learning to like less of it, Fox said.

In addition to sugar and salt, which are natural additives, the Food and Drug Administration has approved nearly 4,000 chemical additives to improve the flavor, color, texture and nutritional value of food, prevent spoilage and ease preparation.

Additives used for a long time are classified GRAS or "generally recognized as safe," Fox said. New additives must undergo extensive toxicity studies before they are put on the market.

Food and drug laws forbid the use of any substance in any amount that causes concern. Because saccharine is used extensively, its continued use has been approved by Congress.

Dorothy Wenck, author of Supermarket Nutrition, said sugar, salt and corn sweeteners compose 93 percent, by weight, of all food additives used in America.

If all that sugar isn't for you, Wenck offers this rule of thumb: "The fancier the food, whether purchased or prepared at home, the costlier it will be, the higher in calories it will be, and the more additives it is likely to contain."

Student dies in car; death ruled accidental

By Kathleen Green

A UNL senior economics major was found dead Friday morning inside his smoldering car on a county road near the Saunders County line.

Steven A. Brott, 25, of 1637 D St., died of carbon monoxide asphyxiation caused by fire, said Lt. Bill Coleman of the Lancaster County sheriff's office.

Apparently Brott parked his 1964 Mercury on the right side of the road one-half mile north of 70th Street and Rock Creek Road. Coleman said he thought Brott had been sleeping inside the locked car. His body was found lying in the front seat, said Lancaster County deputy Clyde Henningsen, who was at the scene.

"The county attorney has ruled it as accidental at this time," Henningsen said Sunday. Officials from the Lancaster county attorney's office could not be reached to verify the ruling.

The Lancaster County sheriff's office and the state fire marshal are investigating the accident, he said.

The Ceresco fire department and Saunders County Sheriff Ron Poskocich responded to a call made by a man who passed by and saw the smoldering car, Henningsen said.

The passer-by called 911 after he couldn't open the car door or see through the smoke-blackened windows.

When the fire department opened the right rear door, a 5-gallon canister of flammable liquid rolled out of the car and burst into flames, Coleman said. Investigators have not yet determined if the flammable liquid caused the fire.

The car was registered to Brott's father, Al Brott of Valentine, Henningsen said.

Brott worked at Vision-Ease Contact Lens Co.
