Oh, that I could become
 Vanna...Vanna...Vanna

6:30 p.m. Channel 10/11 Strong: See Vanna turn the letters over. Good, Vanna, Good! See Vanna smile and clap her hands.

I wish I may, I wish I might be like Vanna White tonight.

R.E.M. sleep comes, and then I'm there in the studio with Pat Sajak.

I'm dressed in that pretty glimmering frock with that darling fur wrap. It's the dream of every girl of the 1980s. Everyone wants the coveted position of network TV's only female game show hostess.

Lise Olsen

Forget those mediocre female models. Barbara Walters get a speech therapist. Barbara Streisand get a nose job. Vanna, a former model and cheerleader, is the ideal woman: She can spell. She notes the moment when a large plastic letter lights up, and she turns it over faster than Richard Dawson kissing the fat ladies on "Family Feud."

But back to the dream.

Lise no longer exists: I am Vanna and the "Wheel" is my life.

It's a phrase, seven and six letters in the two words.

That smart bald guy is guessing "S". Oh boy, there's two of those.

I spring into action.

S-S-

That old bald guy can't guess. "Cardiovascular system," he guesses, as he watches Vanna turn over those letters, oh so deftly.

Darn, Vanna snaps her fingers and shakes her head, displaying that body language that makes her the superstar she is.

The wheel keeps spinning, and the money is flying everywhere.

Then suddenly the "bankrupt" strikes. Everyone is wiped out. Even Vanna has a blank look.

Will no one ever win?
 Will the half hour never end?

Will Vanna's hair start to flop after the fourth consecutive taping?

The Marine sergeant is scratching his head. He buys a vowel — an "E".

She smiles knowingly (Merv lets her in on all the solutions before each show) as she turns over the letter.

-L-T-T
 SE-S-

The vivacious redhead on the end takes a turn.

She too buys a vowel — an "A". It's two for the price of one.

The redhead is pleased: She loves bargains.

-LATA-T
 SE-S-

What could it be? The redhead has a flash of inspiration, but is distracted as she looks at Vanna and wonders how she herself would look with blond hair and capped teeth. The buzzer sounds.

It's the old guy's turn again. He's drooling with anticipation. But it's time for a commercial message. Vanna waves "bye, bye."

From ring around the collar:
 "Can't you get this gross dirt off my shirt collar, Marge?"

"Sorry Harry Neck, I'll try something new next time."

From cold medicine:
 "Barbara, you up? Get out of bed and get me some medicine NOW."

And from Geritol:
 "My wife — I think I'll keep her — even if she is getting old and fat."

And now back to Vanna.

Exciting development: the old guy is on a roll, he guesses M and N correctly and buys an I:

-LATANT
 SE-ISM

The audience is going crazy. The marine's hair is standing on end. Vanna's smile seems frozen with the tension. The sequins on her dress are dancing under the studio lights:

"Blatant," he blurts. "Blatant, uh..."

He doesn't know. The horror, the shame, the buzzer.

The marine looks confident and spins to "Lose a tum."

The curvacious vivacious redhead's got it. It's for all the microwave ovens, trips to Acapulco, Tiffany jewelry and gift taxes.

"BLATANT SEXISM" she screams triumphantly, jumping up and down like she's on a pogo stick.

The audience dutifully oohs, ahhs and claps (as directed by their coach).

Vanna turns over the remaining letters stylishly and smiles.
