Delivery business plans to resume service in fall

By Andy Pollock
Staff Reporter

Despite a small decline in business, Goldentoes fast-food delivery service continues to do well and will operate again next fall.

Jay Wilkinson, owner and manager of Goldentoes, said that because business has slacked off, Goldentoes now only delivers on Sundays.

"During the weekdays we were breaking even, but that's it," Wilkinson said. "Sundays have always been very good, and since last week we decided to deliver only on Sundays."

Wilkinson said he hasn't lost any money by cutting the weekday service. Everything simply is shut down on weekdays and no money is spent, he said.

Wilkinson said his Sunday business is good because neither the residence halls nor the Greek houses serve Sunday. Goldentoes answers more than 70 calls on a typical Sunday, he said.

Wilkinson said he also cut service because he is reaching other business possibilities and because he is trying to build a reserve so he can advertise Goldentoes extensively next fall.

"We are going to make sure that we hit the freshman class hard next fall," he said.

The business has been a tremendous learning experience, he said, and has helped him make business contacts.

"We've had surprisingly few problems," he said. The biggest one was when the national headquarters of another food delivery service contacted him and said they would take legal action against him if Goldentoes continued using a slogan that resembled theirs, Wilkinson said.

Wilkinson said Goldentoes began using the slogan, "One call really does it all," before the other service had a trademark for it.

"Once they got the trademark, the national headquarters called me," he said. "It scared me at first, but we discontinued its use and haven't had any further problems."
