2,700 students receive surveys to help with UNL accreditation

By Jen Deselms
Staff Reporter

Surveys for UNL's accreditation study have been mailed to 12 percent of the student body.

The survey is just one requirement UNL must meet for its accreditation review by the North Central Association, said Harry Allen, UNL director of institutional research.

Universities normally are accredited every 10 years by their regional accreditation agency. UNL's last accreditation was in 1977.

The survey, which was sent to 2,700 students, asks students to evaluate courses, advising, libraries, computer services, classroom equipment, buildings and many out-of-class activities and services such as campus police and recreational programs.

In a letter to students who received the survey, UNL Chancellor Martin Massengale said the self-study "will serve as a basic component of our planning for the future."

Allen said that only 12 percent of the students were surveyed because it is an adequate percentage for compiling accurate results. It also would cost too much to send surveys to all UNL students, he said.

Allen said it is important for all students who received surveys to complete them because more respon-ents makes the results more reliable.

Completed surveys must be returned to the chancellor's office in the Administration Building by May 7.

After the surveys are returned, they will be studied. Reports on the various areas of the university that are surveyed will be compiled in a booklet.

The booklet will then be sent to the North Central Association and used as a basis for its 1987 site review of UNL, Allen said.

Ten years ago, the university was reviewed as one entity, Allen said. This time, UNL, UNO and the NU Medical Center will be reviewed for accreditation separately.

University officials call food service theft minimal

Two UNL Food Service officials tend to agree that dinnerware stolen from campus cafeterias is not a major problem.

Doug Rix, assistant director of University Housing/Food Service, said the dollar amount of stolen items has been steady in his 16 years at UNL, and is "not a terribly big problem."

Stolen items include silverware, salt and pepper shakers, dessert dishes and small glasses, Rix said.

Rix said students are "well satisfied" with the food service in residence halls because cafeteria personnel respond to students' needs. About 2 million meals are served each year at the four residence hall cafeterias on City Campus, and East Union cafeteria on East Campus and the athletic training table on City Campus, he said.

A fraternity did pose a slight problem a few years ago when it was discovered members there had started a game to see who could steal the most dinnerware from residence hall cafeterias. Rix refused to name the fraternity that gave "complete cooperation" to the food service office in settling the matter.

Rix said workers at all cafeteria exits watch for stolen dinnerware. But, he said, it would be impractical to say students don't steal some cafeteria supplies. Most stolen items are hidden under people's coats, in their backpacks or wrapped in a napkin, he said.

Ron Pushear, director of Nebraska Union Food Service, said the union spends about $6,000 a year to replace stolen and broken dinnerware. This figure is "not out of the ordinary," he said.

The Harvest Room, the Colonial Room and some catered banquets are included in Nebraska Union food operations.

Childcare raffle raises $3,000 for new building

The University Child Care Project raised $3,000 from a raffle that began March 17.

The money will go toward remodeling at the group's new location, the Prince of Peace Lutheran Church at 12th and Benton streets.

UCCP, now at 14th and R streets, is moving because UNL bought the Commonplace building where it is now housed in January 1985. The university paid more than $200,000 for Commonplace, said Joyce Wagner, director of the raffle project. It is now used for the Culture Center, a meeting place for UNL's minority students.

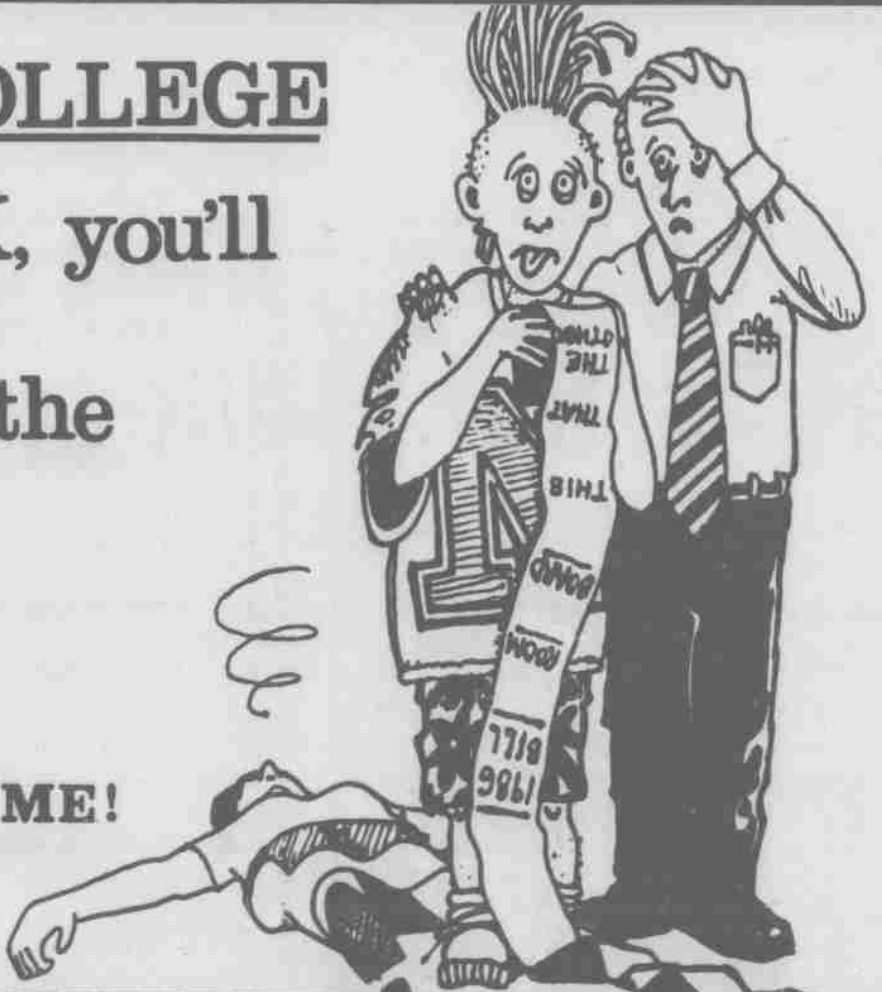

UCCP has been at its present address since 1970 and is expected to be moved by August.

Students, staff and parents helped sell the raffle tickets for remodeling.
