

Passing scores set for tests

Pre-Professional Skills Test now required for TC students

The Nebraska Board of Education recently set passing scores for the Pre-Professional Skills Test, which education majors now are required to pass before being admitted to teacher-training sessions.

Teachers College students have been taking the tests as "entrance exams" to teaching programs for the last two years. After July, 1989, teaching certificates cannot be issued without passing the PPST.

A report in the American Association of College Teacher's Education said that in 1983 the Commission on Excellence in Education published "A Nation At Risk," a report criticizing teachers and teacher education for low educational standards. The report was followed up by Gov. Bob Kerrey's task force on Excellence in Education. Both called for a minimum basic skills test for all teachers.

When the college started giving the tests, two years ago it set its own passing scores, which were slightly higher than the new state scores. According to Dr. Mary Kluender, coordinator of student information, UNL students have been scoring three to eight points above the new state scores.

"We think it's really important for teaching college students to demonstrate that they do have the basic skills to be teachers," Kluender said. "We're pleased with how well students are doing and performing on the PPST."

The test, devised and scored by the Educational Testing Service, examines the student's basic skills in mathematics, reading and writing. The first two sections are standardized and the last is compositional. Since there are no permanent records of students' failures, they can retake the test as many times as necessary. Workshops and individual tutoring are available for a minimal fee through the Student Center for Academic Success Center.

According to Mike Kissler of the State Education Department, 19 percent fail reading, 18 percent fail math, and 21 percent fail writing. Cumulatively, 20 percent fail one part or more the first time they take it.

"It provides good information to the students," James O'Hanlon, dean of Teachers College said. "If they can't pass, they're going to have lots of problems. It's an early warning for them to consider other fields. It measures a few of the things it takes them to make it through college."

The scoring requirements on the test differ from state to state. For Nebraska, the passing scores are 170 for reading, 171 for math, and 172 for writing. O'Hanlon said requiring the exam only will slightly improve educational standards in the United States

"because it doesn't really measure things to determine if a student is successful."

Most teaching students stay in Nebraska. Others are recruited by out-of-state schools to fill teacher shortages, mainly on the East and West coasts. O'Hanlon said he thinks the teaching programs in this section of the country are better, thus attracting better students and putting them through a more rigorous program.
