

Voice of America's team earns own stripes

"Between us we're on 80 million cable homes, which is just amazing," Caray said. "The odds of two people in the same family winding up broadcasting on the two biggest cable operations in the country is really inconceivable."

While in high school, Caray began doing a weekly high school sports show on KMOX in St. Louis. He said he hoped to play football at Missouri, but hurt his knee his senior year of high school.

While in college at Missouri, Caray began doing a local sports show before becoming the Missouri football color announcer.

"One color guy didn't work out, and by then I knew the players and I knew the coach and all that shit, so they just had me do it. That's really how I got started."

From color announcing for Missouri to covering the Goodwill Games and the Atlanta Braves for WTBS, Caray said he's had a busy year of broadcasting.

Caray said it's the Braves' broadcasts that have given him the most notoriety. He said he has been criticized for being a "homer."

"You have a rooting interest," Caray said. "In journalism school they teach you that you must be objective, and you can't root for a team, and that's absolutely bullshit. You can be objective and still root for a team."

Caray said his day-to-day contact with the team makes it difficult not to root for them.

"It would be hard not to root for them because you know them and their families and you want them to do well," Caray said. "From a selfish point of view, the more the Braves win, the more people watch and listen to the games and the more people hear me. It would be awful to be talking and have no one listening. I don't think they would pay me very well if that were the case."

Caray said he thinks his strengths as an announcer are his honesty and his sense of humor.

"It's not like covering the hostage crisis," Caray said. "It's the toy department. It's supposed to be fun. If you watch this game (Nebraska-Illinois) at home and you root like hell for Nebraska, it's not going to happen, but if Nebraska loses, a guy might throw his shoe across the room and be upset for five minutes. But then he's going to realize his kid's sick or his wife's about to leave him or his boss is an asshole and all that is more important than who wins this football game."
