At the Zoo:

BCR, also known as Black Crack Review, plays both tonight and Saturday at the Zoo. BCR is described as an "Afro Nuclear Wave Funk Swing Reggae Tango Band," but I still don't think that describes their brand of weirdness. These guys make The Wallets look like normal accountants. But they're entertaining and easy to dance to. If you want to keep the music going after R.E.M. tonight, stop by the Zoo. Cover is $3.

At Chesterfield's:

The Linoma Mashers — despite what the ad in yesterday's paper suggests, they don't have pseudo-Romantics hairdos — will play tonight and Saturday at Chesterfield's. The Linoma Mashers play traditional ska and island music, the likes unheard of from an Omaha band. I haven't missed a Masher's

Lincoln appearance yet, and I won't this weekend, either. Cover is $3.

On TV:

The season premiere of "Saturday Night Live" is Saturday at 10:30 p.m. Once again the producers have blamed a weak season on the cast and gotten a whole new group to replace last year's deadbeats. In reality, they should have fired the writers. Sigourney Weaver will be the host, and David Johansen, former singer for The New York Dolls, will be the musical guest.

UNL's Laurus is looking out for your talent

By Matt Van Hosen
 Staff Reporter

So you think you're a bit artistic, eh? Do you have a poem, short story, photograph or drawing you think others might like? Would you like to see it published? The UNL English department's literary magazine, Laurus, awaits your talent.

The Laurus, an annual publication, is now accepting poems, stories, photographs and drawings for consideration in this year's edition. If you are interested, hurry — the deadline for submissions is Tuesday.

Who's eligible? "Any student, undergraduate or graduate, is encouraged to submit any work," said Marcia Southwick, director of the Laurus this year.

Orin Stepanek, a former UNL English professor, provided the funds to begin a literary magazine at UNL. Stepanek was strongly interested in the idea of publishing the literary works of students. Southwick described the Laurus as "a project of fine arts of all sorts."

The editing process of the Laurus is done by students, not professors. The students have taken two or three creative-writing workshops, and that's what they are looking for — creative writing.

The Laurus should be on sale in early February for $1. Southwick said he hopes copies will be available in the university bookstores this year.

Students from all colleges are encouraged to send submissions. Southwick said that "it would be great to have a lot of participation from students in the art department especially."

Submissions should be sent to: Laurus, 142 Andrews Hall, University of Nebraska-Lincoln, Lincoln, Nebraska 68588.

Submissions should include name, address and phone number. Photos and drawings should be rendered in a medium that will be well-depicted in black and white on a 5-by-7 inch page. All material, except artwork, cannot be returned without a self-addressed stamped envelope.
