

Varner stepping aside for good

"I've had my picture taken and had nice things said about me," Varner says. "But Ed Hirsch was the one behind the scenes doing the work."

Before he was promoted, Hirsch had announced that he would retire in July. He could have retired a satisfied man. He steered a $52 million capital fundraising campaign that set an early goal of $25 million, and the $20 million Lied Center fund drive was complete. All was well at the foundation. But now Hirsch, 65, will continue working — this time in the spotlight.

He said that he will try to broaden the foundation's base of private support by using new techniques, like telethon calling. However, he said, he also will continue the foundation's practice of seeking large gifts. He's already begun to raise money for a $16 million student-recreation center that will double as an indoor practice field for the Nebraska football team.

"There's a greater and greater need for private support at the University of Nebraska," he said. "I think you'll find practically every program of excellence at the University of Nebraska has private support."

NU Foundation saves programs

The NU Foundation is a private, non-profit organization that may receive gifts to be used only at one of the institutions in the NU system — UNL, UNO and UNMC. The foundation receives no tax funds.

All gifts received by the foundation are tax-deductible.

The foundation was formed June 3, 1936 at the urging of NU Chancellor E.A. Burnett. Burnett explained that the foundation was necessary to offset the university's declining budget during the Depression years.

Ed Hirsch, president and chief executive officer of the NU Foundation says the foundation is particularly important today because private donations are necessary to maintain many of NU's academic programs.

"If it wasn't for private funds, I suspect quite a few programs would have been eliminated by now," Hirsch said.

Last year, the foundation raised more than $17 million for the NU system. The foundation also contributed about $4.5 million in student scholarships.

Hirsch said that in the future, the foundation will stress fundraising drives to benefit NU libraries and establish more endowed professorships.
